GERMANY MAKES WASHING COSTLY

Latest Regulation Cuts Down Per Capita Supply of Soap. Eggs, Too, Under Ban.

(By the Sun News Service.)

Berlin (via Amsterdam), June 13.—"Rules and regulations" is the watchword in Germany these days. Everything is being regulated, every day brings new prohibitions, new admonitions, new bans, new rules, new regulations. And what are about the only things not yet "regulated" in view of the fact that nitrogen is now obtained from the air, and nitrogen is one of the essential ingredients for the manufacture of ammunition, there is no telling what will happen next.

But there is nothing oppressive about this status of affairs. Everybody realizes that this "superorganization" is necessary, and so everybody gladly resigns to things as they are.

The latest article to be "regulated" is soap. The maximum quantity of "fine soap," used for toilette and shaving, stipulated for every person in the empire is 100 grammes-weights a month. Other kinds of soap, soap powder or other fat-containing substances used for beautifying purposes and for washing clothes, may be consumed at the rate of 200 grammes-weights a month—not a bit more, preferably less.

Along with the soap regulation, the federal council has created an egg monopoly, applying to imported eggs. Anyone importing eggs from abroad must deliver them to the central purchasing commission in Berlin.

The same import monopoly governs condensed milk, dry milk and milk powder.
